

The Jerusalem Clock Tower

The Jerusalem Clock Tower: The Ottoman "Daqqaqa" over Bab al-Khalil, Removed by the Mandate

The Jerusalem Clock Tower, or "al-Daqqqaqa" (the Striker) as Jerusalemites called it, was an Ottoman stone tower that rose above Bab al-Khalil (Jaffa Gate) in the walls of Jerusalem, carrying a four-faced clock that chimed across the city. The Ottomans built it under Sultan Abdul Hamid II as part of a campaign of clock towers across the empire. The clock was installed around 1907 on a tower about 13 metres high, built of stone from the nearby Cave of al-Kattan. But the British Mandate authorities removed it in 1922, claiming it was "modern and unsuitable" for the city walls. They moved the clock to another tower and removed it again in 1934, after which it disappeared, and its fate remains unknown. This guide covers the tower's history, its design and the story of its disappearance.

Table of contents

1. Quick facts
2. The name
3. Location: Bab al-Khalil
4. History and construction
5. Design and the clock
6. Ottoman clock towers in Palestine
7. Removal under the Mandate \(1922\)
8. Where did the clock go?
9. Bab al-Khalil today \(2026\)
10. FAQ
11. Sources

Quick facts

The Jerusalem Clock Tower at a glance

Arabic name	برج الساعة / الدقّاقة
Other names	Al-Daqqaqqa, the Mahmudiyya clock
Location	Above Bab al-Khalil (Jaffa Gate) in the western wall of the Old City
Period	Ottoman, under Sultan Abdul Hamid II
Clock installed	Around 1906–1907; tower completed around 1908
Height	About 13 metres
Clock	Four faces to the four directions, a bell, and a crescent and star
Stone	Limestone from the nearby Cave of al-Kattan (Solomon's Cave)
Cost	About 20,000 francs
Removal	1922, by the British Mandate authorities; the clock vanished after 1934

The name

Jerusalemites called the clock "al-Daqqaqqa" (the Striker) for its chimes, which could be heard across the city. It was also known as the "Mahmudiyya clock", part of the campaign of towers built by the Ottomans under Sultan Abdul Hamid II.

Location: Bab al-Khalil

The tower rose above Bab al-Khalil (Jaffa Gate), the western gate in the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem. The gate opens onto the roads to Hebron and Jaffa and was the main entrance for those arriving from the coast. Because of the gate's importance, the Ottoman government built the tower above it and the Sabil of Sultan Abdul Hamid outside it, making the spot the face of the modern city in the early 20th century.

History and construction

- The idea: the clock was linked to the arrival of the railway and the opening of a train station in Jerusalem, which required keeping time for the timetable. It was part of Sultan Abdul Hamid II's policy of promoting trade and modernising cities, under which dozens of clock towers were built across the Ottoman Empire.
- The occasion: Palestinian heritage sources link the tower to the 25th anniversary of Sultan Abdul Hamid's accession, the occasion for the towers of Jaffa, Haifa, Acre and Nablus.
- Construction: work began in the early 20th century and was delayed for years by the city's poverty and slow fundraising, at a cost of about 20,000 francs. The clock was installed above the gate around 1906-1907, and the tower was completed around 1908.
- 1907-1922: the clock chimed above Bab al-Khalil for fifteen years.

Design and the clock

The tower was built of limestone cut from the nearby Cave of al-Kattan (Solomon's Cave) and rose about 13 metres. It carried a clock with four faces turned to the four directions, topped by a bell and a crescent and star. The east and west faces showed official European time, while the north and south faces showed local time, reflecting a city that straddled two worlds at the start of the 20th century.

Ottoman clock towers in Palestine

The Jerusalem tower was one of several Ottoman clock towers built in the cities of Palestine, including Jaffa, Haifa, Acre and Nablus, most of them for the anniversary of Sultan Abdul Hamid's accession. The Nablus clock still stands in Bab al-Saha square at the heart of the Old City, while the Jerusalem clock was removed.

Removal under the Mandate (1922)

After Britain occupied Jerusalem in 1917, the Mandate authorities removed the tower in 1922. An English society, the Pro-Jerusalem Society, had judged the clock "modern and unsuitable" for the city walls, as part of a wider plan to clear modern structures from the walls and gates. The clock was then reinstalled on another, plainer tower a few metres to the north, near the British municipality building. Jerusalemites objected that the new site disrupted traffic and lacked the beauty of the original. In 1934 the clock was removed again, ostensibly to ease traffic, and it disappeared. Jerusalem researchers see the removal as part of a British policy to weaken the Arab economy and presence in Jerusalem, and one Jerusalem historian describes it as "among the most beautiful landmarks, indeed a landmark of all Jerusalem".

Where did the clock go?

The clock's fate remains unknown. Popular accounts say the British took it to a museum in London, or that General Allenby carried it off, and some even claim it was used in Big Ben. Jerusalem historians reject that last story, citing the difference in age and size between the two clocks, and say there is no material evidence that it was taken to London. As one Palestinian history professor put it: "It is certainly not Big Ben", though that does not diminish its value.

Bab al-Khalil today (2026)

Since the occupation of East Jerusalem in 1967, Bab al-Khalil and its surroundings have been under Israeli control, and its square has become a major tourist entrance ringed by Judaisation projects. In 2026 the Old City and its gates faced repeated closures under the state of emergency imposed from 28 February 2026. Today only old photographs recall the Ottoman tower, along with the memory of Jerusalemites who still ask after the "Daqqqa" that vanished from their city's gate.

Frequently asked questions

Where was the Jerusalem Clock Tower?

Above Bab al-Khalil (Jaffa Gate) in the western wall of Jerusalem's Old City.

When was the clock tower built?

Under the Ottoman Sultan Abdul Hamid II. The clock was installed around 1906–1907, and the tower was completed around 1908.

Why was the clock called "al-Daqqqaqa"?

Because its chimes could be heard throughout the city, Jerusalemites called it "the Striker".

Who demolished the Jerusalem Clock Tower?

The British Mandate authorities in 1922, claiming it was modern and unsuitable for the city walls. The clock was later removed from its replacement site in 1934.

Was the Jerusalem clock taken to Big Ben in London?

There is no evidence of this. Jerusalem historians reject the story because of the difference in age and size between the two clocks, and the clock's fate remains unknown.

Conclusion

For just fifteen years al-Daqqqaqa chimed above Bab al-Khalil, announcing Jerusalem's entry into the 20th century, before the Mandate removed it and its fate vanished into mystery. Though gone, the Ottoman clock remains part of Jerusalem's memory, and a reminder that the city's identity was targeted decades before the occupation.

Sources

- Palestine 48 – Jerusalem
- Al Jazeera – One of Jerusalem's most prominent Ottoman landmarks: where did the Bab al-Khalil clock go? (4 October 2026)
- Palestinian Heritage (palturath) – The clock tower in Jerusalem
- Al Jazeera – The largest cave beneath old Jerusalem under Judaisation (2017)

Last updated: October 19, 2026