Al-Dawayima

Al-Dawayima was a depopulated Palestinian village in the Hebron Subdistrict. It lay west of Hebron and possessed 60,585 dunams of land. Published references give its distance from Hebron as either 18 or 24 kilometres; PalQuest's village profile records 18 kilometres, while its dedicated historical study of the massacre gives 24 kilometres.

Its lands bordered those of Idna, Dura, al-Qubayba, Bayt Jibrin, and Arab al-Jabbarat.

The village had a star-shaped layout and extended along the summit of a broad rocky ridge on the western side of the Hebron Mountains. It overlooked Wadi Qubayba to the north and faced higher mountains to the east.

The inhabitants were Muslim. Al-Dawayima contained several religious shrines, a mosque in the village centre, shops, and an elementary school.

Its houses were constructed from stone and mud. The economy rested principally on rainfed agriculture and animal husbandry.

The village was built over an archaeological site and was surrounded by a number of khirbas, indicating a long history of settlement in the area.

Boundaries of al-Dawayima

Al-Dawayima was surrounded by the following villages and localities:

- North: Bayt Jibrin.
- Northeast: Idna and Dura; the original article links al-Qubayba here, although principal geographical references place al-Qubayba northwest of al-Dawayima.
- East: lands used by Bedouin communities of the Beersheba region.
- Southeast: lands used by Bedouin communities of the Beersheba region.
- South: Khirbat Umm al-Shaqaf \(Dayr Muhaysin\) and lands associated with Dura.
- Southwest: Bayt Awwa.
- West: Dayr Samit.

- Northwest: al-Qubayba, Arab al-Jabbarat, and Idna.

Built Environment of al-Dawayima

The village's star-shaped plan allowed construction to expand in every direction, particularly toward the northeast and northwest along the roads connecting it with neighbouring villages.

Shops were distributed throughout the neighbourhoods around the village centre. Houses were built of stone and mud and separated by narrow paths and alleys. The oldest houses stood in closely grouped clusters, each sharing a hawsh: a large communal courtyard where women carried out domestic work, children played, and families gathered in the evenings and on special occasions. As the village expanded, residents built larger houses beyond the old centre. These newer buildings were made of whitewashed stone; some had thick stone walls known locally as jidari, from the Arabic word jidar, meaning “wall.” Unlike the older clusters, they generally stood apart and did not share courtyards.

The internal arrangement of the newer houses nevertheless resembled that of the older dwellings. Each typically had two levels: an upper floor for the family and a lower floor for livestock. Homes belonging to wealthier villagers had their own spacious courtyards, guest and sleeping rooms, storage rooms, and animal stables.

Education in al-Dawayima

Al-Dawayima had an elementary school that opened in 1937.

Economic Life in al-Dawayima

Rainfed agriculture formed the basis of the village economy. The principal crops included wheat, barley, maize, vegetables, figs, and grapes. According to the official 1944/45 land-use figures, 29,191 dunams were devoted to cereal cultivation and 1,206 dunams were irrigated or used for orchards. The figure of 21,191 dunams found in some narrative accounts is inconsistent with the official table and its cultivable-land total. Oaks, Palestine buckthorn, and other trees grew in the rugged terrain surrounding the village.

Animal husbandry was likewise important. Al-Dawayima had twenty-seven clans, or hamulas, each reportedly owning an average of 200 to 300 goats or sheep, together with some camels and cattle. The villagers grazed their animals over extensive uncultivated lands. They also spun fibre and wove tents and sacks for storing grain, tanned animal hides, and produced baskets for sale. The village had approximately thirty to fifty small shops, ten butcher shops, and two grain mills.

The local economy gained further momentum in 1944 with the establishment of a weekly Friday market. It attracted people from nearby villages and towns, including Bayt Jibrin, Hebron, and Gaza, who traded crops, clothing, baked goods, and other merchandise. The market was held on the village threshing floor and was known as Suq al-Barrayn, “the market of the two terrains,” because villagers understood it to bring together the commerce of the mountains and the plains.

Population of al-Dawayima

The 1922 census recorded 2,441 inhabitants, all Muslim. The population rose to 2,688 in 1931, living in 559 houses, and to 3,710 in the official 1945 statistics. The latter figures included several nearby khirbas. A later estimate placed the population at approximately 4,304 in 1948. Armed Zionist forces occupied and depopulated the village during Operation Yoav. A figure of 3,358 is sometimes given for the number displaced in 1948, but its basis could not be verified and it is inconsistent with the estimated village population. The number of refugees from al-Dawayima and their descendants was estimated at 26,429 in 1998.

* The 1922, 1931, and 1945 figures derive from British Mandate census or statistical records. The 1948 and 1998 figures are later estimates. The 1931 and 1945 totals include several nearby khirbas.

Mosques and Religious Shrines in al-Dawayima

The village had several religious shrines, the most prominent of which was dedicated to a shaykh named Ali. The shrine comprised a large courtyard, several rooms, and a spacious prayer hall, and was surrounded by fig and carob trees and cactuses. It attracted visitors from neighbouring villages. A mosque in the centre of al-Dawayima was maintained by followers of the Khalwatiyya, a Sufi order associated with Shaykh Umar al-Khalwati, who died in 1397.

Villagers enlarged and renovated the mosque during the 1930s and added a tall minaret.

Occupation of al-Dawayima and the Massacre

Al-Dawayima was occupied on 29 October 1948 during the Israeli army's Operation Yoav. The assault was carried out by the 89th Commando Battalion of the 8th Armored Brigade, commanded by Yitzhak Sadeh. Contemporary documentation and later testimony establish that Israeli soldiers killed Palestinian civilians in the village, including women, children, and elderly people, and that the massacre precipitated widespread flight from the surrounding area.

The precise number of victims remains disputed. An Israeli soldier's testimony referred to approximately 80–100 people killed by the initial attacking force. The village mukhtar later reported 455 named victims from al-Dawayima, in addition to people from elsewhere who had sought refuge there. Other contemporary diplomatic, military, and local reports offered estimates ranging from about 70 or 80 to several hundred. Because the site was not subjected to a complete independent investigation and United Nations access was initially restricted, no definitive death toll can be established. Estimates therefore vary substantially between sources.

Israeli Settlement on al-Dawayima's Lands

The Israeli moshav of Amatzya was established in 1955 on part of the ruins of al-Dawayima.

The village site was later fenced. Stone terraces and the remains of a house survive in its southern section, while the eastern section is occupied by a residential area of the moshav.

Cactuses and numerous carob and olive trees continue to grow on the slopes.
